Statement by the Foreign Minister of Serbia Following his Phone Conversation
With Senator Hillary Clinton

NEW YORK – The Foreign Minister of Serbia, Vuk Jeremic, spoke today via the telephone with Senator Hillary Clinton (D-NY). The two leaders discussed the recent events surrounding the May 4th altercation between a Serbian national Miladin Kovacevic and American Mark Steinhauer.

“I am incredibly sorry that this event ever occurred and wish to express my heartfelt sympathy for the Steinhauer family,” the Foreign Minister said. “Our constitution does not allow for the extradition of Serbian nationals to other countries; however I can assure both Senator Clinton and the people of New York that my government is absolutely committed to continue its cooperation with American authorities.”

The Foreign Minister updated Senator Clinton regarding the status of the two diplomats that aided Kovacevic in fleeing the American jurisdiction. The two diplomats have been brought before a disciplinary commission and are in the process of being dismissed. Serbia’s State Prosecutor is investigating the possibility of bringing criminal charges against the two men.

Statement by Embassy of the Republic of Serbia
Regarding the Arrest of Radovan Karadzic

WASHINGTON - The Embassy of Serbia in Washington D.C. has confirmed that earlier tonight Serbian security forces located and arrested Radovan Karadzic, who in 1995 was indicted for war crimes by the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia (ICTY). In accordance with Serbia's law on cooperation with the ICTY, upon his arrest, Karadzic was brought to the investigative judge of the War Crimes Court in Belgrade.

Consulate General of the Republic of Serbia Statement Regarding the Miladin Kovacevic Affair

The people and government of the Republic of Serbia express our deepest regrets to the Steinhauer family. We wish that that the May 4th altercation resulting in Mr. Steinhauer's injuries never took place and hope for his recovery.

The two diplomats who aided Mr. Kovacevic in fleeing the United States were brought before the disciplinary commission of the Foreign Ministry and are in the process of being dismissed. Serbia's State Prosecutor is presently investigating whether or not criminal charges can be brought against them.

The Serbian government remains committed to cooperation with American authorities at all levels.

“Resolving the Kosovo Dilemma”

By Vuk Jeremic

Recent events in the Caucasus remind us of the consequences of the use of force in ethnic conflicts. Efforts at reconciliation hardly stand a chance to succeed, and regional stability is rarely achieved. Entire generations can easily be forsaken by the rush to arms.

We in Serbia know all too well the heavy toll of ethnic strife and civil war. We have a strong appreciation for the value of diplomacy over military force. We have worked hard to confront the divisive legacy of the 1990s: overthrowing the dictatorship, reaching out to our neighbors, fully cooperating with the Hague Tribunal, and working peacefully to defend our national interests, including the preservation of territorial integrity.

These efforts were built upon the foundation of Serbia's embrace of democratic values; values that have driven our desire to become a full member of the European Union and a contributor to regional security.

In line with our principles, we became dedicated to arriving at a consensual solution to the future status of our southern province of Kosovo—under United Nations administration since June 1999—through negotiations within the framework of the UN. We continue to feel that the only way forward requires all parties to come together in the spirit of compromise and concession.

Unfortunately, the Kosovo Albanians chose another path. On February 17th they unilaterally declared independence. This act of secession violates the UN Charter, the Helsinki Final Act, and other core documents of the international system.

Serbia reacted responsibly. We ruled out the use of force or other unilateral acts such as imposing economic sanctions on our breakaway province. Instead, we went on the diplomatic offensive. As a result, a majority of the UN's member States have continued to abide by well-established international obligations to respect the sovereignty and territorial integrity of our nation.

It is Serbia's position that given the present state of affairs, the most sensible way forward is for the International Court of Justice (ICJ)—the UN's principal judicial body—to issue an advisory opinion on whether Kosovo's secession is in accordance with international law.

Procedurally, the ICJ must receive a mandate from the UN General Assembly before it can consider such an issue. This will come up for a vote in the next few weeks.

Referring this matter to the ICJ would ease tensions regionally, facilitate efforts at reconciliation and help to restore a number of bilateral relationships. The principal barrier to enhancing regional cooperation, a pre-requisite to EU membership, would be removed. And all parties would be strengthened in their ability to concentrate on what unites us instead of what drives us apart.

From the perspective of the international system, sending the Kosovo question to the ICJ would prevent the province's attempt at separation from serving as a deeply problematic precedent in any part of the globe where secessionist ambitions are harbored. It would also provide politically neutral yet judicially authoritative guidance to many countries still deliberating on how to react to Kosovo's February action.

Moreover, the Kosovo issue would be transformed into a symbol of renewed global resolve to adhere to the rule of international law, rejecting the imposition of one-sided outcomes that seldom lead to stability and legitimacy.

This is a vital issue centered on the principle that any UN member State has the right to pose a simple question on a matter of international law to the internationally mandated court. A vote against this resolution is in effect a vote to deny the right of any country to seek judicial recourse through the UN. The implications resulting from the General Assembly's decision whether or not to seek an advisory opinion from the ICJ would affect every UN member State, as ultimately this issue tests the very legitimacy of the international legal system.
